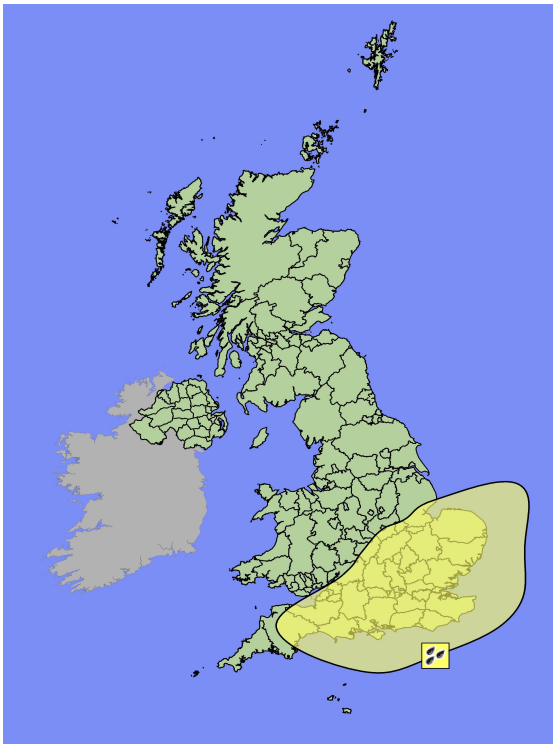
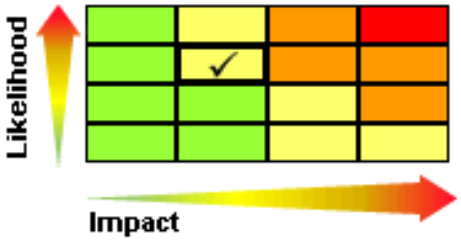
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
There are some uncertainties at present regarding the development of a small-scale low pressure system, expected to cross southern Britain on Sunday morning - at lunchtime on Saturday, it was little more than a cluster of heavy showers.

However this is expected to become more organised, with an area of heavy rainfall developing and moving northeast later on Saturday night and during Sunday morning. The exact track of the heaviest rainfall is uncertain, but 15 to 25 mm could fall fairly widely, and possibly 40 mm in the wettest locations, much of it in 6 hours. Strong winds will pose an additional hazard in the SE, again depending on the degree of development of the low pressure, while it is possible that a little wet snow may fall briefly towards the west of the area covered by the warning.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 03:00 on Sun, 04th Nov 2012 until 13:00 on Sun, 04th Nov 2012

Heavy rain is expected to spread across parts of southern, central and eastern England through Sunday morning, clearing eastern parts by early afternoon. The rain will be accompanied by strong winds in parts of southeast England, possibly gusting in excess of 50mph.

The public should be aware that the rain, falling on already wet ground, may lead to some minor flooding from either surface water or rivers.
